Uber is taking an unusual approach to enforcing its recently-introduced policy of “deactivation” against drivers who share their time and skill with other platforms and apps. The company has asked them to agree to the policy terms, which is a big change from previous attempts to negotiate with other drivers. “We want drivers to sign up for Uber everywhere. This is all about reciprocity,” Phil Lempert, managing director of a consulting firm for ride-sharing drivers, told TechCrunch. “They want to have drivers be the only source.” There’s a lot of animosity directed at Uber right now. Which is understandable: The company has been raising prices while forcing its drivers into minimum fees, which go toward its $70 billion valuation. But drivers have a great deal of admiration for the company, which they see as a paragon of virtue in the industry. Now that it has introduced deactivation, it’s almost like the company is betting its consumers will not take to the inelegant practice of “deactivation”, even if Uber is doing all the deactivating. But it’s not clear that Uber will be able to convince drivers to sign the policy, and some speculate the company will have to introduce a compulsion law like in Germany, which forces drivers to agree to Uber’s terms. “You’re not allowed to play on the Internet without a license, right? If Uber doesn’t give drivers the choice, it’s law enforcement,” Lempert said. “They want to be the private police. And when you’re the private police, you kind of get away with a lot.” Meanwhile, Uber is also fighting with regulators in New York, Philadelphia, and San Francisco over its background checks and fingerprinting of drivers. In a letter to the San Francisco Taxi Commission, Uber said: “Uber’s background-check system is, by design, extremely rigorous and thorough. The Department of Justice has said that driver-background checks — including fingerprinting — are not unlawful unless they are done with the intention of discriminating against a driver.” The company is clearly hedging its bets on the outcome of its deactivation policy. While drivers believe Uber has no
